“ Every time I was with Dolores (which was often because I was lucky to be Roxane's friend in school) my day glowed a little. I can't describe how she always made everything just like it already was, but better, brighter, from the mints she bought just for me, for no other reason than that I liked them, to allowing me to name the spider Roxane and I found in the yard after her, though she didn't care for tarantulas (I took the tarantula to Austin with me when I went to college so I could talk to someone named Dolores every day. My roommate just had to deal with it). Before that, though, she'd be ironing Roxane's shoe laces and dispensing practical advice (she always had the very best advice). She could do anything she put her mind to. I loved how she and David did everything together and how much they loved one another. I'm glad they'll be together again now. I'm so sorry, Roxane, my dear friend, for this enormous loss. I know that you will feel her with you as long as you need her, and you will find comfort knowing your parents are together once more. The world is such a better, kinder, more generous and beautiful place because your mom was in it.
